ATHENS, Nov. 17. — How two Balkan kings kept abreast of world-wide affairs, as the Allies saw them, by the clandestine use of a Nazi invention under the very noses of the Gestapo, has now been revealed in Romania and Bulgaria.

Soon after the Nazis moved in on Bucharest and Sofia, they brought new Hellschreibers ("plain writers"), machines which transform certain radio impulses into words. The apparatus was intended to enable official agencies to record news from Berlin.

But when the Gestapo was away, the Balkan monarchs listened to London, which also has a "Hellschreiber." Bulgaria's King Boris, now dead, and Romania's King Mihai had guards posted to give warning if the Nazis approached while the news tickers of the Nazis merrily clicked off the details of Allied advances.

Mihai was reading 30 pages a day when the Russians arrived.
